rocket-propelled grenade during the 2014 Gaza war, and won praise for quickly returning to the front lines.

Yet once they take off their uniforms, many complain of widespread discrimination in everything from jobs to housing. Their crowded towns are underdeveloped, and they often struggle to receive construction permits from the state, which forces them to build illegally and risk their homes and businesses being demolished. These are problems shared by Israel's entire Arab minority. But the Druze, who have served the state loyally for decades, are particularly resentful. The covenant, they argue, ends when they remove their military uniforms. They saw the nation-state bill as a deeply personal affront. "We come back to our villages, and we have no opportunities," said a resident of Beit Jann, the hometown of another police officer killed in the Jerusalem violence.

A few weeks before Seif's death, a riot erupted between Druze and Muslim youth in Abu Snan, a mixed village not far from Yanuh-Jat. At least forty people were hurt after someone threw a hand grenade into the fray. The proximate cause, as ever, was girls. But it came a few days after a schoolyard brawl between keffiyeh-wearing Muslim students and their Druze classmates. Residents later said that the violence in Jerusalem had pushed communal tensions to a boiling point.

And yet the Druze, Arabs in language and culture, also face discrimination from the Jewish community. Around the same time as the riots, two Druze soldiers—one a wounded veteran of the Gaza war—were refused entry to a nightclub. They said it was because of their Arabic names. Over the next few months, in Jerusalem and a kibbutz outside of Haifa, two different Druze soldiers were beaten up in bars after Jews overheard them speaking in Arabic. One of them, Tommy Hasson, had done his military service in the president's office—Rivlin posted a photo of them together on Facebook. (To add insult to injury, the hospital in Jerusalem later tried to bill Hasson for his ambulance.)

Scholars have warned for years of growing frustration within the community. A 2009 Haifa University poll found that two-thirds of Druze oppose mandatory conscription. The small but growing number of conscientious objectors includes Omar Sa'ad, a resident of the northern village of al-Mughar who spent more than five months in jail for refusing the draft. "I couldn't imagine myself wearing a military uniform and