And yet the marriage was anything but comfortable. He never called her by her first name. They had sex twice a month; when she asked for more, he asked his rabbi for permission. It wasn't forthcoming. "The rebbe said this month we should not do it again, and added and instructed that if you accept my pronouncement, that is great! And if not, that I should sleep in the living room," Ya'akov explained sheepishly. As the unhappy union wore on, though, he developed increasingly strange fetishes. Dasi would later recount how Ya'akov had forced her to have sex with other men while he watched. Eventually, her husband's predilections drove her to attempt suicide. The manuscript, fittingly enough, was called "Doing His Will".

Weinstein disappeared from her home in Azor, a small town outside of Tel Aviv. She looked much younger than her fifty years on the missing poster circulated by police—a woman with a welcoming smile, wavy locks flowing past her shoulders. Her Facebook page, too, was filled with happy moments, photos of her posing by the Sea of Galilee or a waterfront restaurant, a carefree grin on her face.

Her car was found six days later, parked near a beach in Ashdod. Her body was inside, along with a brief note to her family. "In this city I gave birth to my daughters, and in this city I died because of my daughters," it read.

The book she left behind was a roman à clef, the story of her own life as a Gur, the largest Hasidic community in Israel, with more than 10,000 families. (Small groups also live in North America and England.) Weinstein was married to "Ya'akov", whose real name was never mentioned. They had seven daughters together. Like "Dasi", though, Weinstein eventually reached a breaking point—when she was 42, she ran away from the community. Thousands of others have made the same journey. While there are no firm statistics, activists believe the numbers have increased in recent years. Modern technology, in particular, makes it difficult to maintain a closed community.

A few days after Weinstein's body was found, another ex-Gur named Israel Greenhouse posted two lists of the community's regulations on Facebook. The rules, he said, were never written down; instead they were passed via word of mouth, from teacher to student. He started with 104 of them, which applied to unmarried men studying in yeshiva. "A preliminary list, and only a partial one," he noted. Two men were forbidden from sitting on the same bed, or being alone in a room together. Combing your hair was
