they overwhelmingly support liberal social causes and economic policies. And so they view Israel as an extension of their own community—the Upper West Side with better weather and inferior bagels, if you will. Needless to say, in a country where the right has held power for roughly three of the past four decades, this is a misreading of the political map. But the disconnect goes further. The community directs its activism toward issues which are, in a sense, parochial: of great concern to American Jews, but far less import to the people who actually live in Israel, who would prefer civil marriage to a mixed-gender prayer space. The peace process, a source of so much angst in New York and Washington, is not a pressing day-to-day concern to the majority of Israelis.

To take a concrete example, in September 2016, Pew conducted another survey, this time a twin poll of Israeli and American Jews. The pollsters asked both groups to identify the most important long-term problem facing Israel. Two-thirds of American Jews cited security and terrorism. Only 38 per cent of Israeli Jews agreed. They were more concerned about economic problems—which received just one per cent of the vote from American Jews.

Boycott, Divestment, Sanctions (BDS)

On a rainy winter morning, hundreds of people, including the president and four cabinet members, packed a Jerusalem conference center for an anti-BDS summit sponsored by Yediot Aharonot, the country's largest paid daily newspaper. This would be an odd scene in many countries, akin, say, to the New York Times hosting a summit to help the Bush administration combat international criticism of the Iraq war.

One by one, guests took the stage and described the Palestinian-led boycott as Israel's greatest threat. Gilad Erdan, the minister in charge of fighting BDS, warned that campaigners would be made to "pay a very high price," though he quickly clarified that he wasn't planning to assassinate anyone. Another minister called for the "targeted civil elimination" of boycott activists. Isaac Herzog, the opposition leader, predicted that the movement could soon "spiral into a catastrophic situation" for Israel. The somewhat inexplicable keynote speaker, comedian Roseanne Barr, explained that the movement was full of "rich, privileged feudalists promoting ethnic strife to divide the working class," in a speech that evoked