damage, 0.01 per cent of Israel's annual GDP—roughly fifty-two minutes worth of economic activity.

"If I were them, I'd be very happy, because it gives me all the legitimacy," said Gideon Meir. "It tells me that the Israelis are afraid, that we created a big problem for them… we're helping them to become legitimate." Meir would know: he ran the foreign ministry's public affairs department before he retired from the civil service in 2014.

At a time of growing division in Israel, the anti-boycott campaign offers politicians a chance to wave the flag. The European Union opposes BDS, but it did decide in November 2015 to require labels on packaged food and cosmetics produced in Israeli settlements. Diplomats counseled a measured response, because it was a trivial move; none of the products were pulled off the shelves, and the consumers inclined to boycott already know the provenance of Psagot wines and Ahava exfoliators. David Simha, the head of the Israeli-Palestinian chamber of commerce, said the goods in question accounted for less than 0.01 per cent of Israel's $30 billion in annual exports to Europe.

The response from politicians was anything but measured. "The European Union should be ashamed," said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The right-wing justice minister, Ayelet Shaked, threatened to sue the EU. Michael Oren, a former ambassador to Washington-turned-lawmaker, printed up a batch of "made in Europe" stickers and wandered through a supermarket slapping them on bags of Italian wafer cookies—with a photographer in tow, of course. "We want to show that we are doing a lot," Meir said. "So we're doing a terrible job, because we're treating BDS as a domestic political issue."

Bricks in the Wall

The Western Wall is under the supervision of Israel's ultra-Orthodox chief rabbinate, which believes in strict gender segregation. Thus most of it is reserved for men, with women crammed into a small space at the far end of the plaza, hidden behind a screen. For decades, there was no mixed-gender area. Female worshippers were forbidden to read from the Torah or wear tallit, the ritual prayer shawl.

A group called Women of the Wall started challenging this policy in 1988. Activists would gather each month to sing, read from the Torah, and
