it as a dormitory for dozens of students is legally dubious. (After it opened, one of the most common complaints on the street was the lack of parking.)

"Of course the problem isn't that they're Jewish, or that they're religious," another neighbor said. "It's that they're trying to bring the conflict to our street."

Jews have argued for millennia over who is a Jew. The question even has its own Wikipedia page. The establishment of Israel did not resolve that question. On the contrary, it deepened it. In the diaspora, it added a political dimension to Jewishness: some Jews, like President Trump's ambassador to Israel, do not believe that non-Zionists are members of the tribe. And in Israel, the debate—largely irrelevant, of course, to the fifth of the Israeli population that is not Jewish—feels increasingly zero-sum.

Different Israeli Jews have fundamentally incompatible views on how to define Israel as a "Jewish and democratic state". One survey has found that 69 per cent of the ultra-Orthodox, and 46 per cent of the national-religious (a plurality), feel that the state is too democratic. It has also found that 59 per cent of secular Jews think it is too Jewish. A majority of Israeli Jews feel it is inappropriate for Arab lawmakers to sit in the coalition, and majorities of several sub-groups think it is acceptable that the state allocates more money to Jewish communities than to Arab ones.[19]

"We're caught in a crisis of identity. People are worried about globalization, about a sense of losing tradition," said Ofer Zalzberg, a Jerusalem-based analyst for the International Crisis Group. "It's the autonomy of the individual versus Jewish tradition. And nobody knows which side will win."

"I won't forget to die"

It was surely the sort of funeral he would have wanted, with an aerial convoy of world leaders and other bold-faced names flying in to pay their respects. President Obama made the 20-hour round trip from Washington to deliver a 20-minute speech. So did his Democratic predecessor, Bill Clinton, his voice cracking as he remembered his old friend. The Prince of Wales was in the audience, wearing a kippah emblazoned with the royal crest. Dozens of countries, from Canada to Egypt to Australia, sent high-level delegations.
