the final pages of his 1992 book The End of History, the theorist Francis Fukuyama offered a prediction about the future:

> The struggle for recognition, the willingness to risk one's life for a purely abstract goal, the worldwide ideological struggle that called forth daring, courage, imagination, and idealism, will be replaced by economic calculation, the endless solving of technical problems, environmental concerns, and the satisfaction of sophisticated consumer demands.

His words certainly capture the mood in contemporary Western politics. Trump vowed to "make America great again" by building a wall, banning Muslims, and starting a trade war with China. Hillary Clinton promised to tinker with the minimum wage and maternity leave. Brexit campaigners urged the English to "take back control", evoking the days when Old Blighty stood alone against a despotic Europe, while the Remain camp trotted out the much-maligned experts and talked about an "emergency brake" on migrant benefits. Today's center-left is detached from its populist roots, and strongly identified with neoliberalism and globalization, setting the stage for a backlash.

So too in Israel—but across the entire political spectrum. The national-religious movement pines for a Biblical kingdom, an era when Jews had true sovereignty over the entirety of eretz Israel. The ultra-Orthodox are nostalgic, in their own way, for a time before modernity: they wall themselves off from the modern society around them and willingly reproduce the stifling shtetl that my ancestors fled a century ago. Arab nationalists in Israel, like their counterparts across the region, long for the days of Gamal Abdel Nasser, while Islamists choose a "golden age" that happened a millennium earlier. Even the secular Zionists, though they share many characteristics with the Western center-left, have developed their own nostalgia, pining for their short-lived kingdom from 1948 to 1977.

And yet even these lofty goals have now become, in Fukuyama's words, "technical problems". The settler movement, Israel's most ideological, has achieved its most basic goals. Half a million Israelis live in territory considered "occupied," and the two-state solution is dead. Today the leaders of the community are often more concerned with zoning laws and water infrastructure than with the overall rightness of their movement. (One of the biggest obstacles to settlement growth today is not ideology, but the simple fact that many settlements are not nice places to live.) The haredim cannot roll back the modern world. Instead they make concessions to "kosher smartphones".
