a predominantly secular movement which believed that the long-persecuted Jews could only be safe in a country of their own. The religious establishment was broadly hostile to Zionism; rabbis saw it as a sacrilegious attempt to hasten the return of the Messiah. So it was led by secular men, products of the haskalah, the European Jewish enlightenment of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

The early Zionist movement took various forms. There was the "political Zionism" of Chaim Weizmann, the leader of the World Zionist Organization, who focused on lobbying the international community to create a Jewish state. Labor Zionists, who would shape Israel in its first decades, emphasized the need for a progressive society with liberal economic policies, and gave birth to the kibbutzim. The Revisionist movement, the forerunner of today's Likud, believed that Jews should control all of EretzYisrael, literally "the land of Israel", the territory between the Mediterranean and the Jordan River (and perhaps more: some Revisionists lumped in the stretch of desert that is modern-day Jordan).

More than a century later, these ideologies feel somewhat anachronistic. The Jewish state is an established fact; the land is settled, and Israel is now an advanced neoliberal economy, where many kibbutzim are better known for luxury holiday cabins and steakhouses than for dairy farms. Jews have de facto control, if not official sovereignty, over all of the land from the river to the sea. Asking the average Israeli if she is a Zionist is a bit like asking an American how she feels about manifest destiny. The word tends only to enter political discourse in its negative form—an anti-Zionist is a liberal Israeli Jew, unpatriotic, perhaps even pro-Palestinian.

Enter the Zionist Camp. The party was the offspring of a shotgun wedding between Isaac Herzog's Labor Party, the antecedent of the Labor Zionist movement, and HaTnuah ("The Movement"), a centrist party led by former justice minister and lifelong political carpetbagger Tzipi Livni. They spent much of their campaign trying to reclaim the word "Zionist" from the right. (A co-founder of the far-right activist group Im Tirtzu actually filed a lawsuit to block them from using the name. He claimed it was misleading to voters because Herzog and Livni were not true Zionists.)

Two months before the election, the party released a campaign spot entitled "What is Zionism?" It looked a bit like an educational video shot in the 1980s, the sort of thing that might have aired on state television. One by one, candidates appeared in front of a fluttering Israeli flag and outlined
