ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I've worked as a journalist for a decade. I still don't understand why anyone bothers to talk to me. This book is the product of thousands of interviews and informal conversations over the past few years. Dozens of Israeli officials—politicians, diplomats, religious leaders, army officers and others—shared their views. Countless other people, from Majdal Shams to Ashkelon, took the time to chat with a nosy reporter. I chose to build this narrative around events, rather than characters, so most of their names do not appear in the book. But their opinions and stories enlivened the manuscript and enlightened my thinking.

My publishers at Hurst, particularly Michael Dwyer and Jon de Peyer, shaped a very scattered idea into the rather more coherent book you are reading. They also put up with my very flexible definition of the phrase "I'll send it this weekend." No writer enjoys being edited, but Rachel Halliburton did a wonderful job tightening my prose, sharpening my arguments, and moderating my apparent obsession with the word "bizarre".

Parts of this book were adapted from articles that I wrote for other publications, and benefited from the efforts of numerous other editors. At The Times and The Economist, my primary employers, they include David Byers, Alastair Dawber, Suzy Jagger, Anton La Guardia, Christopher Lockwood, Jim McLean, Philippe Naughton, Jonathan Rosenthal and Roland Watson. Elsewhere I would thank Vanessa Gezari, Michael Hirsh, David Kenner, Siddhartha Mahanta, Elizabeth Ralph, Jebediah Reed and Max Strasser.

During three years of writing and rewriting, countless people were kind enough to discuss parts of the book, read draft chapters, or simply offer their thoughts and support. My thanks to the following: Luke Baker, Daria Carmon, Steven Cook, Lina Dakheel, Hafsa Halawa, Gemma Mangione, Yael Mizrahi, Anshel Pfeffer, Dimi Reider, Grant Rumley, Bel Trew, Amir Tibon, and Rania Zabaneh. A particular thank-you goes to H. A. Hellyer, who connected me with my publisher.