sedan. Shalloudi, a Palestinian from East Jerusalem, had driven to Ammunition Hill, where a crowd of evening commuters was waiting to catch a tram, and had plowed the car into them. A three-month-old baby was killed; so was a 22-year-old woman from Ecuador, who had come to Israel to convert to Judaism after discovering she was descended from a converso (a Spanish Jew forced to become Catholic during the Inquisition). Shalloudi was shot dead by police.

A second vehicular attack, on 5 November, had killed three people and wounded thirteen at another light rail station on the seam line between east and west. In between the two attacks, a Palestinian man had tried to assassinate Yehuda Glick, an American-born activist who campaigns for Jewish access to the Temple Mount. He had previously been the executive director of the Temple Institute, a group that aims to build a new Jewish temple on the plateau. (In recent years it had started using in vitro fertilization to breed a red heifer, a cow required for sacrifices.) The violence had also included deadly stabbings at a train station in Tel Aviv and a bus stop in the West Bank.

Until the early-morning assault in Har Nof, though, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had opted for a fairly measured response. Police had installed concrete barriers around light rail stations, to shield passengers from vehicular attacks, and established checkpoints around a few restive neighborhoods in East Jerusalem. But the images of religious men murdered at prayer struck a nerve amongst the Israeli public, conjuring up collective memories of some of the darkest periods in Jewish history. (The Israeli government enthusiastically encouraged this. It shared graphic images on social media within hours of the attack, among them a photograph of a bloodied hand wrapped in tefillin—the cubic black leather box that observant Jewish men wear during weekday morning prayer.) Naftali Bennett, then the hawkish economy minister, told the government to "declare war" on the Palestinian Authority. Aryeh Deri, the head of the ultra-Orthodox Shas party, wanted the army deployed in the streets of Jerusalem. "There are thousands of terrorists in East Jerusalem, and we need to arrest them all," said Baruch Marzel, a prominent settler activist who joined the mourners outside the synagogue.

The cabinet convened a spate of emergency meetings and deployed 1,000 extra policemen to the streets of Jerusalem. Ministers approved longer jail terms, up to twenty years, for Palestinians who threw stones. The army