Bibliography

Throughout this book there are numerous references to a variety of literature I have used. Here I only list those sources that have been extensively used in the writing or which I consider particularly relevant, or those that I have found especially inspiring.

For a detailed account of the Christianisation of Europe, including Central Europe, see Richard Fletcher, The Barbarian Conversion: From Paganism to Christianity (New York, 1997). The last days of the (Western) Roman Empire are examined in Bryan Ward-Perkins, The Fall of Rome and the End of Civilisation (Oxford, 2005), which also gives an interesting explanation of why the Western Empire disappeared, while the Eastern one carried on. An equally fascinating account of the Byzantine Empire can be found in Warren Treadgold, A Concise History of Byzantium (Palgrave, 2001) or in Averil Cameron, The Byzantines (Blackwell, 2009), which I particularly recommend. In his highly readable Byzantine Christianity: Emperor, Church and the West (Detroit, 1982) Harry J Magoulias deals with the religious aspects of Byzantine Christianity and its relationship with the West. The Myth of Nations: The Medieval Origins of Europe (Princeton, 2002) is a very provocative reading of the myths about the early formation of the European nations, written by Patrick J Geary. It leaves all kinds of nationalism, both big and small, looking a bit silly. The general idea of Europe is studied from a number of perspectives in The Idea of Europe: From Antiquity to the European Union (Woodrow Wilson Centre, 2002), edited by Anthony Pagden, as well as in Robert Bartlett, The Making of Europe: Conquest, Colonisation and Cultural Change 950–1350 (Penguin, 1994). A brilliant book on the subject of Europe is Michael Heffernan's The Meaning of Europe: Geography and Geopolitics (Arnold, 1998), where the geographic aspect is particularly strong and fascinating. JHH Weiler defends Europe's Christian roots in Un' Europa Cristiana (BUR saggi, 2003).

Maria Todorova's Imagining the Balkans (Oxford University Press, 1997) is a rather academic, but very thorough and well-argued critical account of stereotypes about the Balkans. The interaction between Islam and Europe is