vocateurs, false propaganda, direct and indirect through education, Press, etc., religious and other forms of fear, economic destitution and starvation. As between two governments it is taken for granted that every manner of falsehood and treachery is justified, provided it is not found out, even in peace-time and much more so in war-time. Three hundred years ago Sir Henry Wotton, a poet and himself a British ambassador, defined an ambassador as "an honest man sent to lie abroad for the good of his country." Nowadays ambassadors are supported by military, naval and commercial attachés whose chief function is to spy in the country to which they are sent. Behind them functions the vast network of the secret service, with its innumerable ramifications and webs of intrigue and deception, its spies and counter-spies, its connections with the underworld of crime, its bribery and degradation of human nature, its secret murders. Bad as all this is in peace-time, war gives it enormous importance and its baneful influence spreads in every direction. It is astonishing to read now of some of the instances of propaganda during the World War, the amazing falsehoods spread about enemy countries, the vast sums spent on this and on the secret services. But peace to-day is itself merely an interval between two wars, a preparation for war, and to some extent a continuation of the conflict in economic and other spheres. There is a continuous tug-of-war between the victors and the vanquished, between the imperialist powers and their colonial dependencies, between the privileged classes and the exploited classes. The war atmosphere, with all its accompaniments of violence and falsehood, continues in some measure therefore even during so-called peace-time, and both the soldier and the civilian official are trained to meet this situation. Lord Wolseley writes in the Soldier's Pocket-Book for Field Service: "We will keep hammering along with the conviction that 'honesty is the best policy', and that truth always wins in the long run. These pretty sentences do well for a child's copy-book, but the man who acts upon them in war had better sheathe his sword for ever."

Under present conditions with nation against nation and class against class this basis of violence and falsehood seems almost inevitable. Privileged nations and groups, desirous of holding on to their power and privileges and denying those whom they oppress the opportunities of growth, must rely on violence, coercion and falsehood. It may be possible, as public opinion grows and the realities of these conflicts and their suppression become more manifest, for the violence to be toned down. As a matter of fact all recent experience points to the contrary, and violence
