before them. It may be that mankind is not sufficiently advanced to adopt them in their entirety. "You offer your candle of vision to the blind," says a character in A.E.'s Interpreters, "but what use can it be to the blind except as a bludgeon?" For the present the vision may not materialise sufficiently, but like all great ideas its influence will grow and it will more and more affect our actions. Non-co-operation, the withdrawal of co-operation from a State or society which is considered evil, is a powerful and dynamic notion. Even if a handful of persons of moral worth practise it, its effect spreads and goes on increasing. With large numbers the external effect becomes more marked, but there is a tendency for other factors to obscure the moral issue. The extension of it seems to affect its intensity. The collective man gradually pushes back the individual.

The stress, however, on pure non-violence has made it something remote and apart from life, and there is a tendency for people either to accept it blindly and religiously or not at all. The intellectual element has receded into the background. In 1920 it had a great effect on the Terrorists in India, and drew many away from their ranks, and even those who remained were held back by doubt and stopped their violent activities. It has no such influence on them now. Even within the Congress ranks many of the vital elements who played a notable part in the Non-Co-operation and Civil Disobedience movements, and in all sincerity tried to live up to the implications of the non-violent method, are now considered as heretics who have no business to continue as Congressmen because they are not prepared to make non-violence a creed and a religion, or to give up the only goal they consider worth striving for—a Socialist State with equal justice and opportunity for all, a planned society which can only come into existence with the abolition of most of the privileges and property rights that exist to-day. Gandhiji, of course, continues to be a vital force whose non-violence is of a dynamic and aggressive character, and no one knows when he might again galvanise the country in a forward movement. With all his greatness and his contradictions and power of moving masses, he is above the usual standards. One cannot measure him or judge him as we would others. But many of those who claim to follow him tend to become ineffectual pacifists or non-resisters of the Tolstoyan variety or just members of a narrow sect, not in touch with life and reality. And they gather round themselves quite a number of people who are interested in maintaining the present order, and who take shelter under non-violence for this purpose. Opportunism thus creeps in and the
