over various moderate non-Congress elements. Even their attitude to such measures as the Temple Entry Bill was varied, and assurances were given to soothe the more orthodox in Madras. A straightforward, aggressive election programme would have created more enthusiasm and helped greatly in educating the masses. Now that the Congress has committed itself to a parliamentary programme there will be still more accommodation of politically and socially reactionary interests, in the hope of getting a few odd votes in a division, and a greater widening of the breach between the Congress leadership and the masses. Eloquent speeches will be delivered, and the best parliamentary etiquette followed, and from time to time the Government will be defeated—defeats which the Government will calmly ignore as it has previously done.

During the past few years, when Congress was boycotting the Legislatures, we were often told by official spokesmen that the Assembly and the Provincial Councils were truly representative of the people and mirrored public opinion. It is interesting to find that now, when more advanced elements dominate the Assembly, the official view-point has changed. Whenever a reference is made to the Congress success at the elections, we are told that the electorate is a very small one, only three millions out of nearly three hundred or thereabouts. The disfranchised millions apparently, according to official opinion, stand solidly behind the British Government. The remedy is obvious. Give adult suffrage and then we shall know at least what these people think.

Soon after the Assembly elections the Report of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Indian Constitutional Reform was issued. Among the varied and widespread criticisims to which it was subjected, stress was often laid on the fact that it showed 'distrust' and 'suspicion' of the Indian people. This seemed to me a very strange way of looking at our national and social problems. Were there no vital conflicts of interests between British imperial policy and our national interests? The question was which was to prevail. Did we want freedom merely to continue that imperial policy? Apparently that was the British Government's notion, for we were informed that the 'safeguards' would not be used so long as we behaved and demonstrated our fitness for self-rule by doing just what British policy required. If British policy was to be continued in India, why all this shouting about getting the reins in our own hands?

The Ottawa agreements, it is well known, have not been of great benefit to England economically except in regard to
