what their teachers had earlier. A record of sorts was created in the annals of policing when over 1100 police officers and trainees went through the course. They were led by none other than the principal of the Police Training College himself, Sunil Garg. The Police Training College was converted into a gurukul, a centre of learning and spiritual enlightenment. This was indeed a rare kind of institution for a police force anywhere!

A survey conducted on the immediate results achieved came up with very interesting results. A question posed was: How many marks do you give yourself out of ten, before you did the course and after? Here are some of the replies: three out of ten before, seven out of ten after; two before, eight after; five before, nine after; and zero before, seven after. The identities of the respondents had been kept secret. In fact, there wasn't a single trainee who had not reported self-improvement in his self-assessment with regard to the difference the course had made to him.

But another, and probably the most important, daily management practice that was put in place at the Police Training College was the feedback system. This practice was somewhat similar to the mobile petition box in Tihar. Here it was called the feedback box; one box (which was locked) was placed in each of the classes for students to interact with the faculty and also give their feedback on the quality of training. The keys to these boxes were with Kiran. These boxes were opened daily. She would read the feedback material and place it before the staff at the daily lunch meeting. She and the others then came up with ways and means of tackling the problems. In the year 1999, she received feedback letters on many important issues, and all of them were attended to and responded to the same day with the decision announced during the evening roll-call by the day officer who was in charge of that activity.

While the practice of holding a daily coordination meeting over lunch facilitated things, it posed a threat as well. Students greatly appreciated it, but some individuals in the staff felt threatened. These individuals, who held on to the hierarchical mindsets, felt that the new system was a breach of the rank structure. Such a structure invariably suffocated communication, unless efforts were made to facilitate it, and this was one of the many efforts to remove the blocks.

On balance, it was this feedback system that kept the students stress-free as they knew they could communicate with the seniormost officials and convey to them their viewpoints, thoughts and requests. Police training became interactive among trainees and trainers. There were free discussions and also a free flow of ideas. Problems and challenges were also taken up. There were open exchanges of views on the visible dichotomy vis-à-vis the law as it was written and applying it in day-to-day situations. In other words, there existed a clash between theory and practice.

Vexatious issues were resolved on both legal and moral grounds and the solutions became evident. But it was agonizing at times to see the kind of insecurities the trainees suffered from. Such insecurities arose due to various factors: their seniors' attitudes and the pressures exerted by influential and organized groups and individuals, politicians, courts, and so on, once they were posted in the field. Similarly, the fear of being punished even for bona fide errors while on duty was seen to be gnawing at them, for which Kiran and her PTC team really had no remedy. The action to be taken in such cases essentially depended upon management styles of individuals in the field, which was beyond the control of the training institute. Another issue that remained unaddressed pertained to personnel policies and their consequences. There was one consistent reply to all these matters: 'You do your best wherever you are; remember you do not have control over others; you are to do what is right, wherever you are; you ought to neither ask for postings nor seek them; you will just get them, be trained to move on; for standing for truth, there will be a price, just as for telling lies, there will be penalties; hence choose which one you want to pay.' Kiran would counsel them as follows: 'Get
