Bharucha. Ruzbeh had flown in from Mumbai to write a book; instead he ended up shooting a documentary film titled Yamuna Gently Weeps on the demolition drive. This film was shown in various international film festivals and today is a part of international documentation. Saina continues to direct the various projects of both the organizations and is also deeply involved in community service. She along with Ruzbeh works for the poor and needy children in the field of education, health care, counselling services, vocational training, drug abuse treatment, and larger issues of empowering the poor and the weak in rural areas, slums and prisons. Their close interaction brought Saina and Ruzbeh closer to each other and now they are together for life. They tied the knot on 13 April 2003. They have been blessed with an angel of a baby girl named Meher and Kiran is now a happy grandmom! Meher calls Kiran 'Naannee'.

On being asked in what all ways did she benefit additionally during her two years with the United Nations, she elaborates pointedly that she learnt > better strategies to assess, plan, and conceptualize, country-specific police reform and restructuring on a case-to-case basis. She also learnt better procedures to recruit, deploy, monitor, mentor, train, appoint and present police personnel. We were coordinating with over 190 member-states and reporting to the Security Council from time to time.

Since her appointment in the United Nations in January 2003, the Civilian Police Division, in which Kiran was the 'first among equals' (as she says), had overseen sixteen peace-keeping operations in Europe, Asia and Africa in conjunction with the military and humanitarian agencies. Currently, over 80 countries are contributing police officers and their expertise to peace-keeping missions. The key challenges faced by the CPD in peace-keeping operations were realistically assessing and conceptualizing the possible and achievable strategies for a devastated country or region followed by receiving timely support of the right kind of personnel from the member-states. In this context, Kiran says:

> In order to make our systems efficient, we have put in place very intensively considered operating procedures, guidance documents and policies which provide for extensive quality standardization. Proper induction plays a vital role. But finally it is the placement of right leadership, with demanding managerial capabilities of all appointed by the United Nations, be it the police commissioner, military adviser, humanitarian officials or the special representative of the secretary-general, which makes the final difference.

Kiran was asked in an interview as to what the contributing member-states like India gained, once the officials returned to their home country after their stint at the United Nations. According to her:

> When Indian police officers work for international peace and security, they act as India's 'ambassadors of peace' and come back with a larger vision of policing through a global experience. They are able to experience internationally respected practices and evaluate what is relevant for their work back home. In some cases, it may make them more confident of their comparative strengths and professional calibre.

The year 2004 was an intensively engaging one for the UN Blue Helmets, i.e., the peace keepers.
