But Kiran did not let the matter die. She reported the machinations to the highest authorities for an inquiry into the conduct of the identified planter. But to no avail. For he had the highest political connections.

Next, Kiran called on the Union home minister and placed all the records, which were fortunately in her possession, before him. She got her promotion to the rank of DGP (see Chapter 36 for details), grudgingly, but still found herself blocked in many ways. She could not match the political clout of the existing incumbents in the Delhi Police. Instead of a posting of her choice, she was given a nondescript assignment, yet another 'parking place for the not wanted'.

Kiran's special learning at the UN remained unutilized.
