The show offers fascinating insights into human behaviour and offers a valid education of rights and laws. It handles civil cases but not those that are sub-judice. And no criminal cases as well. It showcases matters in which both parties are willing to come and present their cases before the camera and the audience, and have no problems in being cross-examined. Based on all this, Kiran Bedi will draw the conclusion. The cases range from family issues to professional relationships to personal matters.

'Siddhartha has a powerful team that consists of heavyweight lawyers who do the vetting, research and briefings, and provide all necessary support. And over and above, there is the vetting by STAR too', says Kiran Bedi.

Kiran is also busy with her two NGOs that reach out to [more than] 10,000 beneficiaries daily through education, training, treatment, mobilisation and care for children, women and men in slums, rural areas and prisons. Besides, they even help people register crimes that the police is not willing to register.

'My inspiration lies in the content of the show and its relevance in current times for a need for independent and fair listeners who can be effective arbiters. The programme is a ray of hope in the lives of millions of people who are struggling for justice,' concludes Kiran.

(Society, January 2009)

With only one difference! I do this facing a camera and millions around the world having access to the channel have got hooked to the processes of negotiation and judgement. It's already being talked off as setting in motion a social movement in mediation and conciliation with enormous benefits including reducing pressure on the law enforcement agencies and the courts, while bringing centrestage people with qualities of fair play and justice.

This life-altering opportunity kept me back in the city since I needed to, in view of the shooting and preparations required for the same, be available at short notice. I was planning to shift to my rural house at Gurgaon (in Haryana), located about 25 km from the Delhi airport.

Now my social and creative commitments demanded that I stay in the capital.

I could have opted for a quiet and peaceful life in a tranquil place away from the chaos, noise and pollution of Delhi. I could have had supporting staff to attend to the routine chores and for the upkeep and maintenance of my house. I could have relaxed for long periods and indulged in my favourite pastimes. I could have preferred a house with a huge garden containing a variety of fruit trees. I could have spent more time in my meditation room within my home temple. But I chose to pitch my tent in Delhi and decided to be totally productive, using every moment of my waking time. I had missions to fulfil.

I started to search for, and soon found, a place that would serve as a home with an office in the basement. Which literally means all the time at work with no time lost in commuting.

To the extent that for me every day is a packed working day, I have lost track of holidays, barring Sundays, which are sacrosanct.

Thursday mornings, except those when I am travelling, are devoted to open-house sessions for visitors or the radio show. Whoever during the previous week emailed or telephoned for consultation or possible help, which can be provided by my office, is attended to. All of them are heard and suitably guided. Follow-up action is also taken wherever needed.

The latest project on the anvil is the setting up of the website www.indiapolice.in. Corporates like