did in Delhi and so the strategies that worked so wonderfully there could not be applied in Mizoram. She, however, opened an indoor treatment facility for the treatment of alcoholic policemen – and it did yield results. Besides this, the younger generation, mainly twelve-to thirteen-year-olds, were on to drugs. Proxyvon was very common and so was heroin. And, worse, when the kids could not get either of these drugs they would inject liquor intravenously, which resulted in a number of deaths. Most certainly, this activity has been the cause for the incidence of AIDS being so high in those areas. Drug abuse was rampant in the tribal belt of Manipur, Mizoram and Nagaland. In Assam, too, it was prevalent but not to the extent as in this belt. The local culture, and the lack of any barrier at the Indo–Burma border, gave the population easy access to heroin and other drugs. She realized that this was the area she would have to concentrate on, once again, prioritizing crime prevention. (See also Chapter 12.)
