In an attempt to make Tihar a correctional institution, most of the reforms that had taken place successively and successfully eliminated the criminalizing traits in its inmates. Their need for, and access to, sensory stimulation had been almost completely eliminated. The majority of them were occupied in acquiring self-monitoring skills. Progressively they were developing decision-making abilities and were thus in a position to exercise accountable responsibility. Procurement of basic life skills had given a large number of them some hope for the future. And all this had helped them greatly in achieving better control over their emotions.
