His comments on an earlier draft of the book were of immense value. Peter has not only provided enduring and crucial support over very many years but remains a beacon of inspiration in his magisterial (and voluminous) writing on British history.

It has taken far longer to complete this book than intended, mostly through illness and other challenges. My publishers at Pen and Sword have been instrumental in seeing the book to completion, and I wish to thank in particular, Claire Hopkins, Alan Murphy, and Sarah-Beth Watkins for their patience and support. I am also very grateful to Laura Hirst and her colleagues in the production phase of the book.

Most importantly, I need to thank my wife, Frances, and our children, James and Lucy, for sustaining me over many years, including through the challenges of recent times, and for helping provide meaning and purpose to life.

Additionally, I want to thank my daughter, Lucy, whose battles with her own health have provided me with perspective and inspiration. I am also hugely grateful for her help in navigating various challenges of modern technology. Finally, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the people who invented the computer, the word-processor, and the internet (none of which in any diminishes my gratitude to the person who invented the fountain pen).
