When Fidel Castro visited America in April 1959, President Eisenhower left Washington to play golf. When Vice President Nixon met him, he was not sure whether Castro was a communist or merely naïve about communism. Nixon nevertheless believed that Fidel ‘has those indefinable qualities which make him a leader of men.’ (Public Domain)

Kennedy and Khruschev’s summit in Vienna in June 1961 did not go well. When they parted, they spoke of war over Berlin. Kennedy believed that Khrushchev saw him as weak and therefore he needed to demonstrate strength.
