Ultimately, the viceroy was to be awarded for his patience. In the days after Chauri Chaura, as public opinion turned and moderates began to withdraw their support from the movement and its leaders, conditions now turned in favour of the Indian government.[128] By the beginning of March, it felt confident enough to re-issue the order for Gandhi's arrest.[129] Reading had been patient, and timed his actions perfectly, so that when the arrest finally took place, there was virtually no public response.[130] As one contemporary noted, 'the fiery emotionalism of Non-co-operation has for the time spent itself'.[131] Yet again, the Indian government could feel vindicated that in its battle with the Home government it had been proved right.

By the end of 1922 then, with Gandhi in prison, the collapse of the non-co-operation movement and the effective end of the Caliphate issue, the Indian government was able to breathe a little easier, and Reading could report that 'for the present the outlook is thus more favourable than it has been at any time during the last three years'.[132] The Indian government had 'managed to come out relatively unscathed' from these troubled years.[133] Nonetheless, the viceroy and his men could never afford to become complacent in this post-war period of tension and upheaval when there were so many disgruntled groups ever-ready to exploit any perceived British weakness. Indeed, just as Muslim and Indian nationalist agitation appeared to be calming down, intelligence reports began to note a resurgence of Bolshevik activity (which would ultimately precipitate the Curzon Note of 1923).[134] For the Foreign Office, this was seen as a direct result of Russia's involvement in the Genoa Conference of April 1922. The Soviet government had been invited to participate in the conference discussions which centred mainly on economic issues – a further attempt by Lloyd George to 'civilise' the Bolsheviks (the first had been the trade agreement) by impressing fiscal responsibility upon them.[135] In a speech made to the House of Commons on 3 April 1922, the prime minister argued that, with the New Economic Policy, Lenin had effectively abandoned the principles of Communism anyway and that by attending Genoa Russia would have to 'recognise all conditions imposed and accepted by civilised communities as the test of fitness for entering into the comity of nations'.[136] Such claims were largely wishful thinking on Lloyd George's part, however, for it appears that the invitation to the Soviet government merely served to increase its confidence in its international position, as did the Rapallo
