11. By this point, the Soviet leader had cemented his influence over foreign policy, taking responsibility for relations with the United States and West Germany centred on the theme of European détente and the perusal of economic relations to supply Russian domestic needs for consumer goods and technology. In this regard, there is little doubt the GDR’s foreign policy unquestionably suffered from the Bonn-Moscow Treaty, as the Soviets ignored East Berlin’s demands for bloc solidarity, a clear signal that Brezhnev would not let the GDR interfere with his own rapprochement with Bonn. (The USSR and West Germany would sign a long-term trade
