for sending her to a small town."

"Why shouldn't she be in a city?"

"Bombing raids. Cities are industrial targets for Allied bombers."

Rose recalled the hours she and Léa had spent in the bunker under the vinegar factory, dust raining down on them as the building swayed from nearby detonations. She'd been sure they were going to die, but they'd survived. "How long would she go for?"

"The contracts provide a period of one year subject to renewal."

She didn't want Léa to go to Germany, but she thought it only right that Maître Mallon present the option to her. And if she agreed, then Rose was determined to go with her. It wasn't fair for Léa to go alone. And the money they earned could be sent back to Virginie, who would need it now that Édouard had been murdered. Whatever terrible things Léa would face over there, Rose wanted to be by her side, together, like they always were. Maybe that could make up for her not being with her on the night Léa was arrested. And alongside that thought, another sat buried deep inside, which —in quiet moments—her mind kept returning to, like an impossible dream —that maybe if she went to Germany, she'd find André.

She missed him. No matter how she tried not to think about André he kept finding his way back into her thoughts. He'd saved her from the wrath of the German soldier, told her she had talent and gave her and Léa a place to go after that awful Madame Martin threw them out. She couldn't forget him. As time passed, she knew she had to do everything in her power to find him. But it must be Léa's decision, and if she chose to go, then Rose wanted to do all she could to help.

"You said if you had more to offer. What do you need?"

"Money. That's all anyone in France cares about."

She thought for a moment. "What about me?"

He shot her a confused look.

"If I agree to go work in Germany, then you'd be offering two workers. Would that give you more leverage so Léa could be sent to a small town?"

"You don't want to do that." He stood. "Your sister's in a camp where the chances of survival are fifty percent. Your situation is different. And I believe she would want you to remain safely here."

Rose didn't want to be safe. Not if it meant being without Léa and André. She couldn't think only of herself like she'd done when Léa had