a former client, and I have documentation to send to him. I don't see why they wouldn't provide me with the information."

"Thank you, it would mean a lot to me." Rose had done her best to make sure André would find her.

Now, arriving at Gare d'Austerlitz, the first time either sister had been to Paris, they stepped off the train. Rose looked around, her heart swelling with awe at all the platforms stretching like fingers on either side of them. A vast iron and glass dome extended overhead, casting shadows that danced across the hall. Rose's hand practically twitched, wanting to capture the narrow lines of light dotting the ground, the curls of smoke puffing from the trains as they lurched forward and backward, the elegant lamp posts. It was the most beautiful place she'd ever seen, and of course, she thought of the person who must have seen it just as she was seeing it now, for the first time, maybe even standing on the same platform—André. She could almost hear his voice whispering to her about the hallway's geometrical lines and the glass triangle at one end where the trains shunted out into the world.

The German escort who'd accompanied them from Orléans motioned with his hand that they should follow him to the end of the platform. The rush of people drove them forward, and Rose nearly dropped the suitcase. Léa grabbed her hand.

"Come on," she said, pulling her along.

Rose wanted to slow down. It was her first time in Paris, and she tried to take it all in, feel the place, remember the shape of the windows, the light coming through, so she could draw them in her sketchbook.

"Papers?" a police officer demanded at the end of the platform, where a phalanx of officers, checking papers, inquired where people were going.

Léa handed over their papers.

His eyes squinted at the letter she presented from the German Employment Office, confirming the two women would be traveling to Germany on the overnight train. Their German escort spoke to him in German and the officer nodded, saluted, folded the papers, and handed them back to Léa.

"Follow me," the German escort said. "Métro is straight ahead." He handed the sisters pale yellow tickets. "We're going to Gare de l'Est."

"What do I do with it?" Rose asked, staring at the ticket in her hand.

"You give it to the poinçonneur," he said, waving a hand at the stairs up