The woman smiled and patted her on the back.

Léa stood waiting at the canteen entrance. As Rose approached with her new friend, she remembered the word the Lagerführer had used the day before. She gestured toward Léa and introduced her, saying, "Schwester Léa."

The woman smiled and put her hand on her chest. "Jana."

Then Jana's friends called to her, and she waved goodbye and rushed over to join them.

"Jana showed me how to coat the brass pieces with shellac. She added two of her finished ones to my wire basket to help me meet the quota." Rose sighed.

"She is a friend, then."

Rose nodded. "What do they have you doing?"

"I have to attach a lens to a metal mount."

"What's it for?"

"The lens goes in gunsights. My quota is ten an hour—one hundred a shift." She linked arms with Rose and led her to the canteen.

"We're not making calculating machines, then."

"No. We're building weapons."

Rose stopped. "Even the cylinders?"

"What did you expect? Germany is at war. They need us to build equipment so they can fight."

Rose felt sick. "Can we ask—"

"No. For the moment, we do as they say. Then, we'll figure out a way to make it up."

"How?"

"I don't know. But we will. Come on, let's get something to eat."

Inside the cafeteria, the tables had the flags of the nationalities of the workers—Italian, Dutch, Belgian, Danish, and French—so they would know where to sit.

Rose smelled the smoky coffee from the stove. They ordered coffees, soup and a piece of kaffee kuchen, paying with ration cards. They sat down at a French table, next to Frenchmen.

Two women stepped inside the canteen. Like the Polish women from yesterday, they wore headscarves and aprons with a patch bearing the letters OST for Ostarbeiter or Eastern workers. Immediately, one of the staff stood