Rose’s heart beat so fast she could feel her pulse vibrating in her wrist. She looked down at her coffee. Only two sips, and now it was ruined. Léa reached across the table, squeezing Rose’s cold hand.

“You can’t just blurt things out.”

“But they’re working here. Why do they blame us for doing the same?”

Léa shrugged. “They were prisoners of war. They hate the Nazis.”

“I hate the Nazis.” Rose hadn’t considered the broader implications of coming to Germany. She just wanted to get Léa out, help Virginie and Paulette, and maybe find André. Now, she’d been called a traitor. “How are we traitors but they aren’t?”

“Men hold us to a higher standard. Forget about it.” Léa stood. “I’ll get you another coffee.”

“No, I don’t want one.” She pushed the cup away.

What if Léa was right and André held her to a higher standard? Would he call her a traitor, like the others? She shuddered—by coming here, she might not find him as she hoped, but instead drive him away.