know where that was, so she stayed silent, hoping her ignorance wasn't apparent.

"It was called Czechoslovakia before Hitler occupied it in 1938. My father worked with a pharmaceutical company in France, selling their products in Prague. I had a French nanny and learned the language from her."

She wondered what circumstances had brought him here and how long ago—but a knock on the door stopped her from asking.

"Herr Capek?" a man's voice came from the outer room.

Josef went to see what was needed, his expression turning serious, then he quickly returned.

"Another ill patient with fever. If you'll excuse me."

Since he seemed to be on his own at the sick bay and wouldn't accept payment, she considered how else she might help. Her gaze fell on the typewriter. "How about if I type your reports after my shift?"

He looked startled. "I can't ask you to do that."

"You're not asking. But I won't be as fast in German as I am in French, so you'll have to be patient. I'm a quick learner. I'll get better."

"It will still be faster than me." He laughed.

"I'll come by after four, if that's all right?"

"It's not necessary, and I don't think it's a fair exchange. But yes, thank you." He led her to the door. "I'll understand if you change your mind."

"I won't change my mind," she said.

Maybe this was how she'd make up for building weapons for the Nazi war machine. The gesture wouldn't make an enormous difference, but it would mean something to her. With this hope, Léa found herself smiling. For the first time since arriving in Glashütte, she didn't dread entering the factory to start her shift because she knew there was other, worthwhile work waiting for her after she finished.