her as she hoped. She could no longer keep what had happened in the church to herself. She had to tell Léa. If anyone could figure a way out of the mess she'd gotten herself into with the Gestapo officer, it was her sister.

Today, they'd agreed to meet at the vegetable garden the sisters had tended on the hill overlooking the town. All summer they'd grown green beans, onions, carrots and tomatoes. The latter were plentiful and Léa planned to bring some back to the sick bay for the patients.

Rose made her way along the winding path that led to the vegetable gardens perched on a slope that received abundant sun. She set about picking the tomatoes and placing them in a wicker basket.

The moment she heard Léa coming along the path, Rose stood and went to meet her. "I've got something to tell you—it's important."

Léa smiled. "Me first. I have a letter that arrived for you today and I think it's even more important." She handed her an envelope.

Who would write to her here? She flipped it over and read the return address: André Simon, Richthofen-Gemeinschaftslager, Berlin.

"André's in Berlin!" She felt her world tilt as if a miracle had occurred. He'd found her. It must have been through Maître Mallon. She clasped the envelope close to her heart.

"Aren't you going to open it?" Léa asked.

She needed a moment to take it all in. André had found her. It was almost too good to be true. Rose looked at her sister. "What if it's bad news? I don't think I could—"

"Don't be silly. Open it," Léa said.

Rose went to a large, flat rock near the basket of tomatoes and sat down. She read her name and address on the envelope again, recognizing André's light touch in his writing. Her hands quavered, knowing he had handled the paper before her.

Richthofen-Gemeinschaftslager
Barrack 6
Tempelhof Airport
Berlin-Tempelhof, SW 68

Rose Cotillard
Foreign Workers Barracks