“Who would have brought it to you?” Léa asked as the mystery of the stranger’s identity hung in the air between them.

“I don’t know.” Rose opened the sketchbook, and a note tumbled out. Léa picked it up. The sisters read it together:

> You left this on the quai. I found your name and address written on the back cover. I’ll be at Place du Martroi, near the statue of Jeanne d’Arc, every day this week at noon. How was Café du Marché? André

Rose smiled. It was the man who had guided her to the safety of the café. And now, he’d saved her by keeping the sketchbook out of the hands of the German soldier and bringing it back to her.

“Who is André?” Léa asked.

“The man I told you about.”

Léa narrowed her eyes. “You said you passed him on Rue au Lin—how could he have seen you leave your sketchbook on the embankment, unless he’d been watching you earlier?”

“I don’t know.” Rose turned the pages until she came to the sketch of the bridge. The paper was slightly torn on the edges, but the drawing hadn’t been damaged. She looked at Léa. “But what does it matter? He might have walked along the quai, seen me, then gone up to Rue au Lin. Why are you always so suspicious?”

“He’s a stranger.” Léa flashed her a pointed look. “Who is his family? Where does he live? He hasn’t been introduced to you by someone we know and trust. Maybe you shouldn’t—”

“Meet him? He helped me; that’s kindness.” Wasn’t it enough?

Léa went to the window. Rose could hear the rattle of the glass pane as the tram passed in front of the boardinghouse. She’d always looked up to Léa, seeking her approval in everything she did. After their mother caught pneumonia in the winter of 1939 during the so-called fake war before the Occupation, and died the following year when Rose was sixteen, Léa became her guardian. She was grateful Léa had fought to keep her, and she hadn’t been sent to live in a home for orphans. Rose wondered if she would have been as self-sacrificing as Léa had been with her. But sometimes Léa’s caring could be overprotective, even oppressive. Now that Rose was