“How did you meet Herr Reinhardt?”

“By chance. I was alone in the church.” Glancing at Léa, Rose shifted her weight in the chair. “He came in, sat with me, we talked, and he took a liking to me, said he would speak to the Meister to grant me privileges. I haven’t seen him again.”

“Maybe it’s a godsend. Why go to him now?”

“I want to help the Polish women who need more food. Léa told me about Maria.”

“We must find another way that won’t put you in danger.” He leaned back against the counter. “Privileges come with strings attached.”

“You mean to report on others?”

“Not only that.”

Rose sat very still. “I’m prepared to do what I must. If he presses me for information on others, I’ll say I don’t know anything or give him false information.”

“Herr Reinhardt’s job is to sniff out false information.” Josef shot a worrying look at Léa. “He’s not a stable man. Nor is he someone you can control, despite what you might believe. I don’t think either of you should be involved with him.”

“But, Josef, you don’t have the medical equipment to save lives,” Léa said. “If we can manage—”

“He’s got a temper,” he cut in. “It doesn’t take much to set him off.”

Léa had never met Reinhardt. She could only go on what Rose had told her. Now that Josef had raised such concerns, she felt less confident. But Rose was in a bind. Reinhardt had been sending her gifts for months; it was clear he desired a relationship. Should she risk upsetting him now by returning any future gifts only to find she might not be able to see André? Or should she try to speak with him to understand his intentions better and possibly find a way to help those in need? She looked at Rose. “Maybe Josef’s correct. We can always find another way to help the Polish women.”

“You know I don’t have a choice. He said we would meet again.” She exhaled. “I can’t make him disappear. And I want to see André.”

“He’s Gestapo,” Josef cut in. “I don’t think you know what that means.”

Rose bit her bottom lip. “Everyone has a weakness. He showed his to me. I can do this.”

Léa heard the determination in Rose’s voice. She had something to