Bohemia and Moravia, the economy was in such a spiral, with no work or food, the Germans easily convinced many to come and work in Germany so they could send money back home."

"But you didn't do that, did you?"

"I was rounded up later."

"What happened?"

There was a long, strained silence before he spoke. "A group of Resistance fighters attacked a German convoy outside Prague. I didn't know anything about it but happened to be on duty at the hospital in Prague when one of the fighters was carried in through the back door, a bullet lodged in the chest."

"Did he survive?"

He closed his eyes for a moment. "I should have reported him . . . the Gestapo arrived, found him and put an end to his life. Then they rounded up all the staff in the hospital who had interacted with the patient and sent us off to work in Germany."

"I'm sorry. What a price we pay for trying to do the right thing?"

He looked at her. "It's why I'm a doctor, to save lives." He shrugged. "I don't know how else to function."

"If you were given a choice, would you have come here to help the enemy?"

"It depends on the context." He smiled. "In the end, how you ended up here isn't as important as what you do while you're here." He slid the chair closer to her.

"Not all would agree. At the canteen, French soldiers spat at Rose, calling her a traitor. Her beau is in Berlin. She plans to visit him. She wants him to be proud of her. Mostly, she wants to be proud of herself, to hold her head high without shame, knowing that she didn't ignore suffering but made a difference."

He smiled. "I admire that. How big is the age gap between you?"

"Three years. But we've been on our own for the last three years after our mother died."

"Then I'd say you've been a good role model for her. Will you go with her to Berlin?"

"Yes, we've put in a request for a leave of absence."

"Berlin has everything. I could have saved that man today if—"
