“Tell me?”

“I had basic items like a tourniquet, gauze, bandages, antiseptics, even gloves.” He shook his head. “I don’t have any money to buy them.”

“If Rose develops a relationship with Reinhardt, he—”

“No. I could never forgive myself if she got in trouble with him because of me. You mustn’t allow her to do this.”

“Let’s see what happens tonight. Rose says he’s lonely and seems to need her.”

He tilted his head. “What if that’s a ruse, to draw her to him?”

“How could he have known she would be in the church?”

“I don’t know. Perhaps I’m paranoid, overreacting. Rose is terribly brave and good like . . .” He stared at her.

For a moment, Léa wondered if he might kiss her. Did she want him to? Yes. But he didn’t move, so she stepped away, flustered. Foolish, she told herself. Josef, a doctor, was refined and educated. He would never be attracted to a simple typist like her.

“I haven’t thanked you properly for all the time you spend typing the reports,” he said.

“It’s nothing.”

“Can I ask you something?”

“Yes.”

“Do you— Who is this French beau waiting for Rose?”

She’d expected a question about herself. Wrong again. Feeling a burning rise in her cheeks from embarrassment, she grabbed her bag. “A man named André from Orléans,” she said, a little too quickly. “I’m going to the barracks. I want to be there when Rose returns.”

“Léa?”

“I have to go.” She nearly ran for the door. “See you tomorrow.” She was being childish and didn’t want to make a fool of herself in front of him. She couldn’t let him see that she was imagining him having feelings for her that he didn’t have. She liked typing his reports and didn’t want her presence in the sick bay to make him uncomfortable. Ever since Léa had seen André and Rose together, she’d yearned for the same sort of love. It was silly. She didn’t need romantic love to have an enjoyable, fulfilling life. There was nothing wrong with being alone. She must stop dreaming about things that weren’t meant for her.