that she was not meant to speak without him asking her to.

“Where is the list?”

“What list?”

“Of the patients who cannot return to work quickly. I need the names to arrange their transport.”

“Transport?”

“To other camps, of course. They cannot stay here if they’re unable to work.”

Rose had heard rumors about death and concentration camps that circulated among the foreign laborers. That threat kept the production line going, the quotas met, because there was always the fear that something worse awaited them if they stepped out of line. Of course, Josef wouldn’t put a single name on that list. No good caring man would. “I don’t know.”

He leaned back in the chair. “Isn’t it fortunate that destiny placed you and your sister in close contact with him? Now, I’ll have two pairs of eyes and ears in the sick bay, reporting to me on what’s going on.”

Rose’s leg began to shake as it always did when she felt a wave of fear like blackness descending. Curling her right foot around the chair leg, she let her panic coil tight against the wood, all the while holding his gaze. “I haven’t spoken with Herr Capek much. It’s my sister who works with him on the patient reports.”

“Léa?” He read her name from the file on his desk.

“Yes.”

“Well, perhaps she can provide you with what I’m after. Please ask her to observe Herr Capek. To facilitate communication, I expect you to bring the patient reports at night from now on. I will inform Herr Capek by letter of my decision.” He gulped down the rest of the tea, emptying his cup. “These nightly visits will allow you to share with me what you’ve learned and, I hope, provide the names I require for my list.” He looked down at his desk.

Rose nodded, sensing their meeting was drawing to a close, but she still hadn’t procured vouchers or money to support the other women. “There is one thing I wondered—”

He raised his head and stared at her.

“Is it possible to obtain more food vouchers?”

He gave her a puzzled look. “Aren’t enough provisions provided for the