imposing stone façade. Two eagle sculptures, gripping a swastika in their claws, perched on top of columns at the building's entrance. Léa read the sign: Ministry of Aviation. She thought of all the lives that had been lost and all the lives that still had to be sacrificed before this dammed war would be over.

She feared for the people who would be trapped inside the city as the worst came. What about her, Rose, André and Josef? Would they all be swept up in it, too? How would they survive the violence that was surely headed to Germany? Berliners glanced nervously over both shoulders as though they knew something terrible was coming, and now Léa knew it too.

Kaffee Post was at the end of a quiet street behind the elegant shops on Unter den Linden. There were no tables outside, only a large window where customers could line up for pastries. Léa overheard the Italian, Dutch and French accents of the foreign laborers milling around outside, taking advantage of their lunch break to be in the fresh air.

The sisters went in and took the last table in the corner. It was round and small with only two chairs. "Shall we wait for a bigger table?" Rose asked.

"No. I'll leave you two to get reacquainted and return to Potsdamer Platz to find the medical supply shop."

Léa had no intention of intruding on their reunion. In her pocket was a long list of supplies to bring back for Josef.

She imagined Josef in his office typing the reports. Though it was silly—since they were just friends—she missed him. The best time of the day, what she looked forward to, was being by his side. She liked his warmth, the kindness and respect he had for others, and all he taught her about caring for the sick. She'd begun to do more than typing the reports, helping with other, smaller tasks.

They ordered two coffees. "Will you tell André about Reinhardt?" Léa asked.

"Do you think I should?"

"Yes." Maybe men understood other men in ways women couldn't. If André backed up Josef's warnings about Reinhardt, it might give Rose the push she needed to stop meeting with the Gestapo officer, if that was even possible. The sick bay had built up enough resources to get through a few months without the extra money and who knew how much longer the war would go on. "Tell him."