would never be the same. She'd heard of men who court and charm. Men who force themselves, taking what they want. But she hadn't known there was another type—a hunter who treats women like prey. She had not known that such men existed until she met Reinhardt. He'd been hunting her since that first day in the church, slowly drawing her in with gifts, then money, realizing she would give it to Josef and Léa for the sick bay, and finally bringing André here, all the while taking his time, setting the trap for her to walk into. Now, all he had to do was slam the door shut, and she would belong to him.

"I will make you a home here," he said.

She tried to reason with him. "Felix was important to you, as is Léa to me. She will return to France and I must go with her."

"No. You will stay here with me."

She was sweating heavily, her dress sticking to the skin between her shoulder blades.

"As man and wife?"

"Let me be clear: I will never touch you, I promise, if you don't want me to. I do not believe in forcing myself on a woman. If, over time, you develop feelings for me . . ." His voice trailed off. He leaned forward, placing a tentative hand on her shoulder, but when she winced, he removed it quickly. "Only if it came about from your own free will."

"Free will?" Her voice was weary. "If I understand, I will marry you, and all nineteen women are saved. I don't marry you, they die."

"I'm offering you a bargain," he said. "Marriage in exchange for nineteen lives."

He had lost his mind. But he was standing before her like he always had. She knew he he hated the Russians enough to kill all the women tomorrow if she said no. To give up André and her life for him, she would demand more, the most she could get. She would ask him to protect those she loved. "You must do more."

His face twitched.

"You will help Léa, André and Josef escape Glashütte before the Soviet army arrives."

"I'm the one with terms," he shouted. "Not you!" Returning to his desk, he fumbled to fill his pipe with tobacco.

Now she was watching him, and he didn't seem to like it because he