and disinfect the wound on the patient's foot. In the ten months since she'd been working at the sick bay, Josef had taught her how to do many things, allowing her to operate independently and giving him more time to tend to severe cases. After Léa finished changing the bandage, she would tidy up and stack all the items that needed to be cleaned and disinfected on the counter next to the sink.

She looked forward to spending time alone with Rose. They hardly saw one another anymore except for early in the morning while preparing for their shifts, and at night before bed. But they were always in a rush and rarely had time to sit and talk freely. When Léa had worked at the factory, they always had lunch together. But since moving to the sick bay, she didn't have time to meet Rose for lunch. They were both so busy, and any free time that Rose had, she naturally spent with André.

Léa had noticed a change in her sister. Her eyes no longer sparkled like they used to. It had started in the summer, not long after the Russian women arrived in cargo trains. Léa mentioned it to Josef, but he couldn't see anything different about Rose. Perhaps it was something only a sister would catch.

"I'm back," Rose said, entering the sick bay.

"All good with Reinhardt?" Léa was at the sink washing the medical equipment to prepare it for disinfection.

"Same as always." Rose put the five-Reichsmark note in the tin can on Josef's desk, then joined her sister at the sink. "I'll help you disinfect the equipment."

"What you're doing with Reinhardt—"

A kidney-shaped pan slipped out of Rose's hand and fell on the floor.

"We appreciate it."

Rose picked it up and put it in the sink.

"I don't want you to think—"

"Can we not talk about Reinhardt, please?" Rose said.

"Has anything happened?"

"Why on earth would you think that?"

"Because you haven't looked at me once since you entered—it's almost like you've got something to hide."

"You're being ridiculous."

"Am I?"