here when the Soviet army arrives, they won't permit us to leave."

"They can't hold French citizens. He could be wrong," Josef countered.

"He knows better than we do. He has contacts—"

"In the Gestapo," André interrupted. "Do you hear what you're saying?"

"I know better than you who he is." She swallowed. "But without him, you'd still be in Berlin. Now, he's willing to help us get to the Allied side." She turned to Josef and Léa. "He's arranged a car and driver for tomorrow morning at seven."

André stepped forward. "Why would a Gestapo officer help us?"

Léa saw a faint flicker behind Rose's eyes. She had the same question. Why would Reinhardt help them? In these last days of the war, wouldn't he only care about saving himself?

"He wants to make amends for the horrible things he's done."

"He'll have to do that in prison," André scoffed. "Preferably hanging by a noose."

"Is that true?" Josef went to Rose. "What did he tell you about the car?"

"I believe—"

"You want to believe it." André glared at her.

Léa noticed that Rose had been acting strangely over these last weeks. Had she and André argued? She'd been so busy looking after Katya, keeping a close eye on her now that she was crawling and able to grab things and put them in her mouth. It wasn't safe to leave her in the sick bay unsupervised. She hadn't had time to speak with Rose. She regretted that now. She also had the sense that Rose was avoiding her. Either her sister was up to something she didn't want Léa to find out about, or she and André were fighting. Either way, she would talk to her tonight.

"What Rose proposes is our only option," Josef said. "I support it." He put his arm around her. "I'm grateful that you've thought this through. We've all been so busy with the sick bay. Thank you."

"It's best for everyone," Rose said.

"Josef and Rose are right," Léa added, turning to André. "What do you think?"

"A group of men in my barracks left yesterday. No one stopped them." André shrugged. "I guess we don't have anything to lose by trying. A car will be a lot faster than going on foot."

"We need a weapon," Josef said.