“I’m sorry, dear, no,” she said, arranging them by order—the most recent on top of the earlier ones from Orléans. She handed the first one to Eve.

“Is that . . . blood on the cover?” The young woman’s finger traced over the faded stain on the cardboard surface.

“Don’t pay attention to that—it’s not important.” She motioned to the book. “Open it.”

Turning back the cover, Eve let out an involuntary gasp as her eyes traveled over the portrait. “It’s Papa, I know it,” she said. “I can see him the way Maman always talks about him. Round glasses. Broad shoulders. Those eyes. Is that the office in the sick bay? Look Katya, the typewriter!”

“The Hermes?” Katya leaned over to get a better look. “Maman told us about it and says that she still knows the keys by heart.”

Eve looked at Rose, her eyes welling up with tears. “Maman said you were an artist, and it’s true. You’ve captured . . . it’s better than a photo . . . thank you.”

Rose put a hand on her shoulder. “You’re welcome, my dear. The first five are all of Josef. He’d sit in his office, writing the patient notes that your mother later typed into reports. While I waited, I’d sketch him.” She smiled. “He was so absorbed in his work, I don’t think he ever knew what I was doing.”

Eve quietly turned the pages, wiping a tear from her face. “What were you waiting for?”

Rose swallowed. “Not important. Look, do you recognize her?”

“Maman?”

“Yes.” Rose looked down at the sketch—the only one she’d made of Léa and Josef together.

“I thought it was all so terrible in Germany—Maman said she hated it. But here, she looks happy.”

“It was terrible. And we hated it, but we were also in love.”

“You too?” Katya asked.

“Yes.” Even though it had been so long, Rose still felt a thud in her heart when she remembered André. “But I have something for you.”

Rose lifted the sketchbook off the pile, opened it, and pulled out a faded green card with a black-and-white photograph on it. She gave the card to Katya.