leaned in close, then pulled back. “I’d like to meet Léa. Why don’t you and your sister come to the vineyard on Saturday? I’ll be working on the harvest, but you two can join in, if you’d like. I’ll show you how to pick the grapes, and we can have lunch together with the family.”

“That would be nice. I think Léa would like it, too.”

He smiled. “Let’s meet again at Quai du Roi at nine in the morning? It’s in Combleux, a twenty-minute walk from there.” He stepped back, turning away.

“André, thank you again for the pastels. And please be careful—I don’t want them to find you.”

“Don’t worry. They won’t.”