have the whole day to find the right ones but there is one condition."

"What's a condition?"

"It's like a rule," Léa explained.

"You cannot include anything that I've already drawn."

"Oh," Paulette said, looking around the kitchen. "No grapes?"

"No. You have my sketchbook. Study the drawings carefully, make a list of every object I've sketched, and then you will be able to check that what you put in the basket is correct."

"I will get your sketchbook now," Paulette said, jumping down to the floor.

"No, you won't." Virginie pointed at her chair. "Sit down, Mademoiselle LeBlanc. First you will finish your breakfast, get dressed, complete your homework, then help me with some laundry, and once that's all done you can carry out Rose's task."

A little petulantly, Paulette returned to the chair. "How many objects should I find?"

"As many as you want," Rose, said, before realizing that the task was meant to keep Paulette occupied for most of the day. She corrected herself. "But the basket must be full, you could even bring me two baskets."

"Two baskets?" Paulette's eyes widened.

Rose nodded.

"And for me," Léa said. "I want you to write down the name of every object in your notebook, with correct spelling and accents."

"Oh no, I can't spell." Paulette shook her head.

"That is exactly why you must do it," Léa said. She turned to Rose. "Let's get started. We have a full day."

Once the sisters were outside, they shared a laugh.

"Do you think we overdid it with Paulette?" Rose asked.

"Not at all. She needs to practice because apparently the marks on her dictées at school aren't good. Come, we've got four rows left to harvest. If we each do one in the morning, eat a quick lunch, then one in the afternoon, we'll be done by the time Paulette comes out of the house with her baskets!"

The sisters went into the chai to put on their overalls. Édouard was inside crushing and removing the skin from the grapes they'd picked the day before. Édouard never had breakfast with them—he was always up