would. It didn’t matter that notaries, government officials and the women in the boardinghouse working in German armaments factories were collaborating—they would say they had no choice and did it for France. But what would they say about Léa moving to Germany?

It would be a mark on her forever. She didn’t know what to do. Her mother’s voice came to her: let it sit with you, and time will sort it out. At least Léa could look forward to seeing Rose again soon—and that gave her hope.