thus turned on its head. Finally, the Chinese never regard anything as having an ending, but as a process. This allows them to make concessions when there is no alternative, as in Vienna on 6 September 2008, by keeping larger interests in mind, such as relations with the United States or India, and to subsequently leverage their 'cooperation' in return for benefit. They are adept at generating feelings of gratitude in the opponent and in disguising their own feelings of guilt.
