The book was conceived at LUMS a decade ago in 2009 during my time there as a visiting professor. It grew over the years that followed; however, the initial idea came over a cup of coffee just after Ramadan 2009 on the LUMS campus whilst I was speaking to a few of my students. I am therefore first and foremost indebted to Dr Ali Khan for inviting me to LUMS, giving me an office, an apartment on campus and the space to conduct my first in-depth study on citizenship and the Pakistani youth. Over the many coffees and my regular stays with them, Ali, Mariyam, Alena and Ali's father Sheriyar Khan became my Pakistani family, and the book is dedicated to them.

LUMS is a truly wonderful place to undertake any kind of research on Pakistan – it is an academic haven, a quiet, studious bubble that allows for intellectual exchanges and has great students who love to engage and exchange ideas. I am deeply indebted to my colleagues at LUMS as well as my various LUMS-based researchers, in particular Farhan Ul Haq and Mariyam Mohiuddin Ahmed, who all contributed time and effort, either with me in the field collecting data or by helping with the data-entering and analysis back on campus.

Tania Saeed joined me a few years later to make this a really remarkable in-depth study. The book would not have had this breadth and depth without her.

I am also indebted to the Citizens Foundation (TCF), in particular Riaz Kamlani and Raheela Fatima, who helped me access many TCF schools and then accompanied me across all four provinces on a number of trips. The TCF directors, in particular Mushtaq Chhapra, have always been supportive of my research work. The British Council in Pakistan has to be mentioned – as it was whilst doing a study on their Connecting Classrooms project that the citizenship book I was starting to give up on got a new lease of life.

Over the years I have worked with many Pakistani researchers and teams drawn from a number of organizations. I am not able to mention them all here, but much of the data would not have been collected without their efforts. Particular thanks go to Adnan Dastgeer, Arifa Bhagat and Rehana Batool.

Many Pakistani families treated me like one of their own, letting me stay, keeping me fed, watered and caffeinated as well as listening to my endless stories from the field. I want to thank Uncle Suhail Sethi for a decade and a half of
