10 However, the student president of the ISF was killed in an act of target killing so this only confirms the fears of the youth that being a part of politics is risky business. Accessed on 22 May 2012. www.defence.pk/forums/national-political-issues/129729-waseem-baloch-killed-pti-isf.html

18 The UNDP Human Development Report 2017 has slightly different figures. 'The 2013 general elections in Pakistan marked a shift in perceptions about the youth, who emerged as a significant political constituency. Numbering about 55 million, nearly one out of two registered voters (48 percent) were between 18 to 30-years old – half of them from the urban middle class – against the national turnout of 55 percent' (p. 116). However, despite the number of registered young voters there is no data that can show if on the day these young voters went to the polls, making the comparison with the national turnout of 55 per cent a moot point.
19 Voting data by age is not consolidated centrally. Age-specific data is kept in each district separately.
20 Because these are not organized protests as such and people, mostly poorer, gather on their own with no one leading them.
21 One can argue that Nawaz Sharif's win in the May 2013 elections underlines this point. Many wanted change, but were equally reluctant to give it to the PTI who they see as inexperienced.
22 Crick develops the concept of political literacy that is imparted through education but is 'more than a school educational subject' (2000, p. 110). He discusses political participation as an essential element of citizenship. He describes political literacy as a combination of knowledge, skills and attitudes, developing alongside each other, each one enforcing the other two. Davies (2008) also believes there are reasons why political literacy should be promoted: 'Politics has to connect with young people: it must be taught and learned in ways that are congruent with the essential nature of political education' (Davies 2008, p. 381). Dean (2004 and 2007) has argued that in Pakistan political literacy is low as there is a lack of dedicated citizenship education.
