friendship, Abbas Rachid and Dr Tariq Rehman for many fruitful discussions as well as Arusha Kamlani and Tayyaba Siddiqi for always providing me with a home in Karachi.

I am of course indebted to 1,900+ students, teachers and parents who filled out the forms, sat in focus group discussions or interviews with me across the four corners of Pakistan. It is their voices I have endeavoured to replicate in this book, so that others might read what they had to say about their government over the last decade.

My final thanks go to my husband Viren Lall who has put up with my weeks and months in the field in Pakistan, India and Myanmar for the 22 years that we have been married. I am truly grateful for his patience and unwavering support.

I joined Marie on this book project in 2013 when I returned to Pakistan after finishing my doctorate, and it has been an incredible five years of research and writing. I am grateful to Marie for being so incredibly supportive.

I would also like to thank all those people who supported me during the fieldwork in Karachi and Lahore, some of whom became good friends in the process. Uncle Ishrat, for helping me gain access to universities when I was struggling to find participants, and for his constant encouragement. Amra and Shireen aunty for their consistent support in Lahore. Amina and Mujeeb uncle for being such incredible hosts in Karachi – I truly found another home with them.

For all those individuals who helped find contacts, the teachers who allowed me to speak to their students, and the wonderful students who genuinely engaged in long conversations with me, trusting me with their opinions and points of view – I am truly indebted to you all. I hope I have done justice to your narratives.

I would also like to thank Haroon, Shahid, Zainab, Ayesha, Abdullah and Daneen for reminding me of the importance of having a life beyond work. Bipana, Pegah, Sakina and Asma, thank you for checking up on me, and listening to my rants during this writing process. I am also grateful to my incredible colleagues at LUMS for their constant support and encouragement.
