Academy (Talbani 1996). However, unlike his predecessors and following the agenda of Islamic socialism Bhutto nationalized the educational institutions of the country (Rahman 2004). It was also under Bhutto that Pakistan Studies was promoted as a subject. The Pakistani identity and citizenship as propagated by the education system gradually began to be framed within the context of Islam, only to be permanently sealed during the Zia era.

Under Zia-ul-Haq's regime the education curriculum was revised in line with 'Islamic ideology' to create a 'society' that was in accordance with 'Islamic tenets' (Ministry of Education 1979, p. 2, as discussed in Dean 2005, p. 37). The National Education Policy and Implementation Programme 1979 focused on an Islamization agenda of all subjects 'including the sciences and mathematics' (Lall 2009, p. 184). This was further supported in higher educational institutions, where 'Islamiat and Pakistan Studies were made compulsory at the undergraduate level', with an 'Education of the Citizen' chapter included to 'impart the teachings of Islam', to help the citizens lead 'a clean, purposeful and productive life' (Ministry of Education 1979, p. 30, as discussed in Dean 2005, p. 37). Students who had 'memorised the Quran' were given additional marks in 'professional studies' (Lall 2009, p. 184), something leading to discrimination against non-Muslim students.[2] A female-focused curriculum aligned to the 'distinctive role' of Muslim 'women in Islamic society' was also developed (Ministry of Education 1979, p. 3, as discussed in Dean 2005, p. 37). The private school sector nonetheless flourished under Zia's regime thereby retaining the status quo of the English-speaking elites (Rahman 2004). With Pakistan entering the Cold War as an ally of the United States, the madrassa system received a boost from the government, perpetuating the narrative of the true Muslim against the God-hating communist. Salim and Khan (2004) exploring the legacy of Zia-ul-Haq's military regime note that his primary legacy can be seen in an intolerant curriculum that continues to promote Hindu–Muslim differences, reinforces the idea of a separate Islamic state, the dispute in Kashmir, India's constant threat and the urgent need to defend Pakistan against its enemies, thereby reinforcing the role of the military for Pakistan's survival.

The 'democratic interlude' that followed Zia's government did little to challenge Zia's legacy of Islamization, continuing with the 'emphasis on the two-nation theory with its concomitant hatred for India, glorification of war and the military, subservience of teachers to administrators, increased control of the military and the private sector over elite education' (Rahman 2004, p. 18). According to Rahman (2004) the 'lip service' was only 'to democracy' (p. 19). The Musharraf era that followed proposed educational amendments in line with a policy of 'Enlightened moderation' and in keeping with its role in the 'war
