domain of discussion or dialogue. This is especially problematic when religion becomes the basis of the citizen's identity. While the goals of the 1992 education policy included encouraging 'a spirit of appreciation for religious and cultural activities and festivals of all communities', the emphasis was on a particular ideology as linked to the Pakistani identity, a form of indoctrination that began from primary school (UNESCO 1997, p. 4). With Social Studies introduced in Grade 4 the 'basic rights and duties of a citizen' and the 'Pakistani ideology' was part of the curriculum, but Social Studies also taught the importance of 'understanding … Islamic values of social justice' (UNESCO 1997, pp. 23–4). Islamiyat for Grade 5 promoted 'love for Pakistan and its citizens' (UNESCO 1997, p. 28). The ideological intersection between different subjects with an emphasis on Islam was taking place in a post-Zia era, at the time of Rahman's 'democratic interlude' of the 1990s, where the education system, far from challenging an exclusive religious citizenship curriculum, reinforced it. Another prominent feature of the education curriculum was the glorification of the military as an important aspect of citizenship in Pakistan, one that was repeatedly highlighted in the Social Studies and Pakistan Studies textbooks, often supported by historical factual errors as examined by K. K. Aziz (2010) in his aptly titled book The Murder of History. A Critique of History Textbooks Used in Pakistan.

The 1998–2010 education policy also emphasized the role of Islam as a central feature of education, promoting the idea of Pakistani citizenship in relation to the notion of a good Muslim (see Zaidi 2011; Dean 2005). Nayyar and Salim in their analysis of the 2002 education curriculum revised by the Ministry of Education found that the curriculum continued to 'distort' historical events to serve its own citizenship agenda, incited 'militancy and violence', promoted 'prejudice' and 'insensitivity' against women and minorities, glorified war, and continued to promote an uncritical understanding of history and identity (2003, p. v). However, with Pakistan becoming more involved in the war on terror, and fighting militancy on its own soil, there was a recognition of the need to rethink the education curriculum, evident in the National Education Curriculum 2006. Yet, there remained a stark difference between rethinking policy and actually enacting it through reforms to textbooks and teaching across educational institutions in Pakistan. For example, the Pakistan Studies 2006 curriculum highlighted the importance of promoting 'an understanding of the ideology of Pakistan, the Muslim struggle for independence and endeavours for establishing a modern welfare Islamic state', as well as inculcating 'awareness about the multi-cultural heritage of Pakistan … to enable the students to better appreciate the socio-cultural diversity of Pakistani society and get used to the