> rights but it was only after Nehru told him not to expect anything once the British left, that Jinnah was forced towards a separate homeland. That is when all the different provinces were made to join Pakistan; The idea that Pakistan was built for Islam came during Zia's era; Besides the problem is which version of Islam are we trying to enforce in Pakistan.
>
> (Focus Group, Private University[10])

The 'which version of Islam' problem rings true especially in a city like Karachi which has been a victim of sectarian and ethnic violence since the 1990s (see Siddiqi 2010; Gayer 2007). However, this level of critical reflection was mostly limited to a section of students within the private universities that were included in the sample. The attitude that universities have to provide an alternative perspective to the national curriculum of Pakistan Studies, the willingness of teachers and academics to engage with such an alternative, is also one that determines the extent to which a critical approach to citizenship and citizenship education is possible in the country. There is a constant threat to academics and teachers who may want to introduce a more critical approach to education, or may challenge any prevailing discourse on Islam. Junaid Hafeez is one such academic, a Fulbright scholar who was a faculty member at the Department of English Literature, Bahauddin Zakariya University (BZU), Multan. Hafeez 'was accused of blasphemy by several of his students belonging to the largest religiopolitical party of the country, the Jamaat-e-Islaami', resulting in his arrest and eventual incarceration[11] (Ali 2016; Tariq 2016). Muhammad Shakil Auj, the dean of the faculty of Islamic Studies at the University of Karachi, was accused of blasphemy for a speech he delivered in the United States. He was known for 'promoting liberal views on Islam' in the classroom and was eventually gunned down in 2014 (Buncombe 2014). Presenting a more critical view of identity and citizenship especially in relation to Islam may literally be a death sentence. While many believe this conservative view of citizenship to be a legacy of Zia-ul-Haq's regime, the democratic and self-proclaimed secularists that have followed in the last thirty years have also reinforced this narrow definition of citizenship. Not only is this normalization evident in the education system, but also in the state–citizen contract that gives the Pakistani citizen a passport. The Pakistani passport contract includes the following clause: 'I consider Mirza Ghulam Ahmad an impostor prophet. And also consider his followers, whether belonging to the Lahori or Qadiani group, to be non-Muslims' (as quoted in Hanif 2010; also see Imam 2016). The clause, almost a fine print, is one that is signed by every Pakistani in order to obtain a Pakistani passport, and no self-proclaimed 'enlightened' or secular government has challenged this contract of