exclusion. The normalization and institutionalization of discrimination against the Ahmadiyya community; the hatred against Hindus, Christians and Sikhs reinforced through the education system; and the prevalence of a largely Sunni interpretation of Islam in schools and universities all testify to an exclusionary and divisive Islamic ideology in relation to citizenship in Pakistan.

The two-nation theory: India – the arch nemesis

Another dominant theme related to citizenship in Pakistan is the anti-Indian sentiment that is consistent across all narratives. This anti-Indianness was prevalent among students belonging to private and government educational institutions. Their narratives echo the anti-Indian, anti-Hindu discourse that is dominant in the curriculum, one which is again reinforced by media and political actors as India is constantly projected as the arch-enemy of Pakistan, with the Indian Intelligence Agency Research and Analysis Wing (RAW) accused of infiltrating Pakistan and creating havoc in the country. Focus group discussions across universities invariably brought up the constant threat that Pakistan faced from India, which further legitimized the role of the military as the protector of Pakistan. However, some participants went so far as to describe hating India as part of the citizenship narrative for young Pakistanis.

> Whenever someone says India's bad I am happy. I tend to be very religious yet listen to latest English rock. This is the reality of current Pakistanis
> (Student, Male, Lahore)

> Disliking India, remorsing about the wars we have lost, cricket, being patriotic just because we are born Pakistani and not reading our history or the reasons why the country was created. And Islam
> (Student, Female, Karachi)

The response of the twenty-year-old male highlights how young Pakistanis in a globalized setting are simultaneously negotiating different parts of their identity, where he is 'religious' 'yet' listens 'to latest English rock' while at the same time being anti-Indian. The second respondent has listed the requirements for being a citizen in Pakistan that range from 'disliking India' to 'cricket', 'being patriotic' for simply being 'born Pakistani' without any idea about one's 'history', and 'Islam'. Her response summarizes the narrative of citizenship that is propagated by the education system. But this anti-Indian sentiment is expressed not just in the education system but also through media and political rhetoric. The extent of the Indian threat is evident in the case of Umar Draz, a Pakistani fan of Indian cricketer Virat Kohli, who hoisted the
